Cheatsheet Checklist: Performance Review Preparation for Managers

Coaching for Manager	Managers need training to understand the best ways to communicate with and support their employees at all times, including formal performance reviews.
Allot Adequate Time	Make sure to provide employees enough time for peer and self-assessment reviews, and that you begin your performance reviews a week before the in-person review. Also, allocate enough time for your face-to-face meeting to review everything you need to cover.
Use Performance Logs	Take notes on positive performance, and if you notice something that needs to be corrected, jot it down and immediately have a conversation with your employee to redirect behavior or activities that need to change. Writing reviews should be much easier and take less time.
Written Reviews and Meetings Are Equally Important	Written and in-person assessments both need adequate attention.
Know Legal Obligations	Being aware of federal and state anti-discrimination and other laws and regulations is part of your responsibility as a manager and should be part of your ongoing training.
Understand Cross-Cultural and Sexual Harassment Issues	If your company doesn't provide training in these areas, you can ask for training as part of your own career development.
Understand Employee Reactions	Your interpersonal skills should be up to the challenge of dealing with emotional issues that may arise because of negative and positive assessments.
Timing and Cadence	Once-a-year assessments are usually not sufficient to cover every area you and your employee need to discuss. Feedback should be frequent and ongoing.
Review Job Plan	Supporting an employee's career pathway is an important way to support the company and build trust and engagement with employees.
Share Performance Review Format with Employee	Transparency is an important aspect of trust building and getting the most out of reviews for both you and your employee.
Establish Clear Goals and Objectives	Your employee should know what is expected and how achievements will be measured.
Two-Way Written Agendas	Agenda from manager to employee and from employee to manager should be shared and then worked into a single document before the meeting to cover all points.
